Katelyn has been working with her brother for four years now. She is not just a good sister to him, but also a great provider who goes above and beyond what is needed to make sure her brother works on his goals, and gets the best experience possible to meet them. She takes him out into the community to help him socialize and learn to behave appropriately in public places. She attends all programs with him at Church, where they have a program for special needs kids, so that he becomes used to the program and learns to participate. He is now quite independent when he goes there and she simply shadows him and only steps in if needed. In order to provide him with peers, she sometimes takes him to social gatherings with her own friends. He hangs out with them and truly enjoys being with young people closer to his age. His social skills and behavior in public have improved greatly from this, as well as his speech and language. He is treated like all the others and has good role models to show him how to do things appropriately when needed. He loves his special time with his sister and provider, as well as all her wonderful friends who have seen him grow up these last few years. He now asks to go places when they are done with their goal work at home, and is more social than ever. Lillian

There's never an easy way to prepare yourself and family for a new Respite Provider. Especially after having such a fantastic one for over a year. But the second Taylor Shaw walked into our house; I said to myself, "she was meant to be in our life"! Within the first two minutes, she squatted down to my Son's height and shook my Son, Gavin's, hand and introduced herself to him. I knew her heart was true and her passion for working with children was perfect for my Son. I made my decision immediately after our interview and when she left that day, she kneeled down and asked Gavin's permission if she could come back to his house again. She showed the upmost respect for him and he was immediately comfortable with her. The first week she worked with my Son, I came home to find a hopscotch game taped to my tiled floor. Taylor was working on hopping and balancing on one foot with Gavin. He has a weak core and low muscle tone and without asking her, she takes the initiative to come up with activities to help strengthen his core and balance. I'm always amazed when I come home to find projects he's been working on with her, like using his pincer grips to make three dimensional shapes using mini marshmallows and toothpicks! She always asks Gavin how he feels about a situation and really makes him aware of how important his response is to her. Taylor always has a positive attitude and I really appreciate when I'm talking with her, whether I'm explaining what Gavin is working on in school or therapies, Taylor always gives her undivided attention to me and asks questions for me to elaborate and the next thing I know, she's working with Gavin on what I mentioned to her only one time. Gavin is so happy when he sees her and even though he is nonverbal, he expresses to me with gestures how much he enjoys working with Taylor and is always so proud to show me what he created with her. Every day ends with a smile on his face and that is one of many reasons why I appreciate Taylor and thankful that she is in our lives!

How to make a paper snowflake

Need: square piece of paper & scissors Instructions:

1. Place a square piece of paper on a flat surface.
2. Fold one of the top corners down to meet the opposite edge, forming a right triangle.
3. Fold the triangle in half, forming a smaller triangle. Crease well.
4. Fold the triangle into 3 equal parts. Fold the left corner over, forming a sharp point at the top on a diagonal fold. The left corner will extend below the ordinal triangle.
5. Fold the right corner over the left side, folding along the edge of the triangle you just created. Crease well. You should have a cone shape, with 2 bottom tips pointing out.
6. Use scissors to trip the 2 bottom tips. This will leave a straight edge and form small, narrow triangle.
7. Begin cutting small designs and shapes, such as a squares and triangles, out of your triangle. Cut through all layers. The shapes you cut will form the design of the snowflake.
8. Carefully unfold the paper to reveal your snowflake.
